Red Tide

Red tides occur when coastal waters become overpopulated with certain types of algae and phytoplankton, including dinoflagellates, a type of single-celled algae. Many of the plankton species associated with red tides produce potent toxins that pose a serious threat to fisheries, marine ecosystems, wildlife, and human health. Once found primarily in the coastal waters of the United States and Europe, red tides have become a global problem.

On 2 August 1990 Iraq invaded Kuwait. Despite significant aid from the United States, the prolonged Iran-Iraq war of the 1980s had left Iraq's economy crippled, and access to Kuwaiti oil was a powerful motive for Saddam Hussein's aggression. The United Nations condemned the invasion, demanding a complete withdrawal of Iraqi troops from Kuwait by 15 January 1991 and imposing economic sanctions. The United States President George Bush organised a broad international coalition, which led to a build up of some 750,000 troops in the Gulf region, including 500,000 from America. The fighting began on 16-17 January 1991, with sustained large-scale air attacks on Iraqi targets. Iraq responded with missile attacks against the coalition and Israel, in an attempt to force Israeli involvement in the conflict and thus fracture the fragile Arab-American alliance. The coalition began the ground war on 24 February, and advanced rapidly, recapturing Kuwait and establishing a cease-fire on 28 February 1991. Iraq sustained an estimated 100,000 fatal casualties, while the coalition suffered less than 200 killed. By liberating Kuwait, President Bush and the coalition had fulfilled the UN mandate, but as Saddam Hussein managed to maintain his grip on power until 2003, the conflict had arguably done little to advance US goals in the region or to promote greater stability.
